Day 2 - 2 June 2015

Future of the Parliamentary Scrutiny of European Union Affairs

8. National Parliaments' Involvement in EU Decision-making: State of Play and Overview of Existing Instruments

This keynote speakers were Mr Herman De Croo, Member of the Flemish Parliament and Mr Gunter Krichbaum, Chair of the Committee on European Affairs of the German Bundestag.

Joint Committee on European Union Affairs

In a debate with 14 contributions, calls were made for national Parliaments to work more closely with the European Parliament; confidence in the EU institutions had to grow so as to lend more democratic legitimacy to the EU institutions and that closer cooperation with the aim of cutting distance between national Parliaments and EU institutions was needed, thus making the EU and its society more European.

9. Green card: Towards an Enhanced Political Dialogue

(Deputy Dominic Hannigan, Chairman)

The keynote speakers in this session were Deputy Dominic Hannigan and Mr Paolo Tancredi, Vice-Chair of the EU Policies Committee, Italian Camera dei Deputati.

The Chair, Ms Čigāne opened the discussion on this agenda item underlining that the question of the "green card" had triggered a wide range of reactions ranging from enthusiasm to scepticism. She then gave the floor to the keynote speakers representing both sides, while regretting that the European Commission was not able to intervene.

In his contribution, the Chairman thanked the Dutch Eerste Kamer, the Danish Folketing and, in particular, the UK House of Lords for their respective roles in launching the debate on a greater role of national Parliaments in the EU.

He noted that a majority of Parliaments did not see the green card challenging the European Commission's right of initiative, nor the role of the European Parliament. In this context, he welcomed the position expressed by the European Parliament's AFCO Committee, who considered the "green card" proposal positively as long as it did not amount to a real right of initiative. Furthermore, he reckoned that the "green card" would only give a limited role to a group of interested national Parliaments in the agenda- setting, given the fact that the number of green cards would be relatively low and it would be up to the European institutions to react on these.

Mr Hannigan noted that a majority of Parliaments supported the idea of introducing a "green card". A wide consensus seemed to be emerging on key issues, such as the scope, the threshold, the timescale, and the role of the European Parliament. He stressed that the next logical step would be to launch a pilot project. In this regard, he proposed to consider the proposal by the UK House of Lords on food waste. Finally, he expressed his hope that the European Commission and, in particular, Vice-President Timmermans would give this initiative the attention it merited and would respond to it.

ANNEX 1

New 3.7

COSAC calls on the European Commission to continue to assist EU workers if and where job displacement does occur in the short term, by means of the European Globalisation Adjustment Fund.

5.2 (a) COSAC calls for a whole of Europe response to this crisis situation. It is of the opinion that all Member States have an obligation to assist people fleeing from war and that the utmost should be done to assist people fleeing poverty and persecution in their home countries. COSAC acknowledges that some Member States are accepting more refugees and immigrants than others and that this is placing significant burdens on the resources and finances of these Member States.

COSAC calls on the European Commission to explore the option of processing of migrants in a remote area outside of the EU (extra-territorial processing) as a matter of urgency. This could help to eliminate the need for migrants to undertake a dangerous sea crossing and to stem the numbers currently crossing the Mediterranean Sea.
